Falling Man is an epic failure largely because Don DeLillo tries to tell a story that is simply not his story to tell. Often lauded as the "first 9-11 novel" this story starts with our MC, Keith, literally on the streets of Manhattan after the second tower falls— already a risky and weighted choice for a narrator.

Falling Man by Don DeLillo - Goodreads

DeLillo, I would say, believes the world evolves through set pieces. Yet much of Falling Man feels like an attempt to avoid turning 9/11 into a set piece - as if that would be in some way distasteful.

Most of us don't want to think in difficult ways about what is difficult to think about. We would rather make an art out of repressing memories—both of the falling man and The Falling Man. And so in the end nothing really changes much in the wake of 9/11. DeLillo's characters continue on with their doggy lives.

Falling Man by Don DeLillo | Quarterly Conversation

The novel Falling Man, by Don DeLillo, is about the September 11 attacks. The "falling man" in the novel is a performance artist recreating the events of the photograph. DeLillo says he was unfamiliar with the title of the picture when he named his book.

Then there's Falling Man (2007), about the September 11 attacks. When Falling Man came out, reviewers noted that DeLillo's earlier books had seemed to anticipate the events of September 11, as well as the aura of dread and unreality that followed. DeLillo seemed prescient not because he predicted the future, but because he focused on ...
